PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT

Petitioner WILLIAM ADAMS, through his attorneys, GERALD A. SNIDERMAN and R. STEVEN WHALEN, respectfully asks that this Court issue a Writ of Certiorari to review the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Michigan.

OPINIONS BELOW

The full text of the December 21, 1993 order of the Michigan Supreme Court reversing, by a 4-2 vote, the Michigan Court of Appeals and reinstating Petitioner's conviction, is reproduced in the Appendix, page 1a.

The full text of the April 7, 1993 opinion of the Michigan Court of Appeals reversing Petitioner's conviction by a 2-1 vote is reproduced in the Appendix, page 2a.

The full text of the February 25, 1994 order of the Michigan Supreme Court denying reconsideration is reproduced in the Appendix, page 14a.

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Michigan Supreme Court reinstating Petitioner's conviction was entered on December 21, 1993.

Petitioner's timely motion for reconsideration was denied by order entered on February 25, 1994.

This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under 28 U.S.C. sec. 1257(a).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION INVOLVED

The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides:

> "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath and affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Manner in which federal question was raised in the state courts

Petitioner was charged in the Recorder's Court for the City of Detroit, Michigan with the felony offense of possession with intent to deliver more than 650 grams of a mixture containing cocaine, M.C.L. 333.7401(1) and M.C.L. 333.7401(2)(a)(i); M.S.A. 14.15 (7401)(1) and M.S.A. 14.15 (7401)(2)(a)(i). By way of a motion to suppress evidence in the trial court, Petitioner challenged, on Fourth Amendment grounds, the execution of a search warrant at his apartment in Detroit, Michigan. Following an evidentiary hearing, the trial court denied Petitioner's motion to suppress evidence.

Petitioner then proceeded to trial, and was convicted as charged by a jury. Following sentencing, he took an appeal by right to the Michigan Court of Appeals, challenging the execution of the search warrant under both the Fourth Amendment and under Michigan law. The Court of Appeals reversed his conviction, ruling that there was no substantial basis for finding probable cause to issue the search warrant. One Court of Appeals judge dissented from this opinion. The Court of Appeals based its ruling on Michigan law as set forth in People v. Russo, 439 Mich. 584, 487 N.W.2d 698 (1992)

The prosecution then filed a delayed application for leave to appeal to the Michigan Supreme Court. Petitioner filed a response which argued both Michigan and federal constitutional law. (Petitioner's response in the Michigan Supreme Court is reproduced in the Appendix, page 16a). The Michigan Supreme Court reinstated the Petitioner's conviction "for the reasons stated in the dissenting opinion in the Court of Appeals."

Subsequently, the Michigan Supreme Court denied Petitioner's timely motion for reconsideration.

Facts

The cocaine which formed the basis of Defendant's conviction was seized pursuant to a search warrant which was issued on February 10, 1988. Prior to trial, Defendant moved to suppress all evidence seized pursuant to the warrant, based on the insufficient and defective nature of the affidavit in support of the warrant. The affiant for the warrant was August Bernhard, a Detroit police officer. (The affidavit in support of the search warrant is reproduced in the Appendix, page 32a).

In his affidavit, Officer Bernhard alleged that on the afternoon of February 8, 1988 (two days before the search warrant was issued), while off-duty, he was shopping for boots at a store in the Eight Mile-Farmington Road area of Detroit. He said that he saw three "black males" enter the store, and noted that they wore full coats, some gold jewelry, and "Rolex type" watches. Bernhard also stated that, like himself, the subjects were there to purchase boots, and were "looking at ones running some $250-300." Bernhard stated that two of the three subjects had pagers, and the third had a cellular telephone. Bernhard claimed to have overheard one call, in which one subject told someone to "give him the other half 'ki'." The caller went on to say, "we'll be at the apartment in about 15 minutes," and also said something about meeting at a carwash.

According to Bernhard's affidavit, he left the store and set up what he called "surveillance." He observed the three subjects leave the store and enter an automobile. However, the affidavit does not state how much time elapsed between when Bernhard overheard the telephone conversation and when the subjects left the store. Bernhard followed the subjects to the Sherbrooke Apartments in Detroit. He observed the subjects remove something from the trunk, which he stated were "probably packages from the boot store." He stated that after changing his location, he observed the subjects enter apartment 201. Bernhard stated that each apartment in the complex had a separate, outside entrance, and that apartment 201 had some sort of grate. He said that "only a few" of the apartments had grates.

Bernhard said that when he returned to where he had seen the subjects park the car, it was gone. He did not observe which of the three subjects, if any, drove the car away, and he could not say who, if anyone, remained in apartment 201.

Based on these facts, Bernhard concluded that apartment 201 was a "stash house," and that narcotics and related items would be found there two days after his observations.

Although the trial judge denied the motion to suppress, he repeatedly called the issue of probable cause a "close question" (Transcript of 3-3-89, 9, 14, 21). Referring in particular to Defendant's argument that probable cause, if it existed at all, was stale, because the warrant was issued two days after Officer Bernhard's observations, the trial judge stated, "Now, I've already said it's a close question. If I were sitting down and I were the one signing the warrant, and I say this for the record, I might have some serious questions about whether I would draw the inference there." (Transcript of 3-3-89, 21).

The Court of Appeals reversed Defendant's conviction, holding, in a 2-1 decision:

"We agree with defendant that the information on which the search warrant was based was stale. The magistrate should not have issued the warrant and the trial court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence and quash the warrant."

REASONS FOR ALLOWANCE OF THE WRIT

The decision of the Michigan Supreme Court in this case is in conflict with this Court's decisions in Illinois v. Gates[1] and Sgro v. United States[2].

In Gates, this Court adopted a totality of the circumstances test in assessing whether or not a search warrant affidavit establishes probable cause. This Court stated:

> "The task of the issuing magistrate is simply to make a practical, common-sense decision whether, given all the circumstances set forth in the affidavit before him, including the 'veracity' and 'basis of knowledge' of persons supplying hearsay information, there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of crime will be found in a particular place. And the duty of a reviewing court is simply to ensure that the magistrate had a 'substantial basis for...concluding' that probable cause existed." (Emphasis added).

[1] 462 U.S. 213 (1983).

[2] 287 US 206 (1932).

Probable cause or information which is stale--that is, which existed remote in time from the issuance of the warrant--may render a warrant invalid. In Sgro, this Court stated:

> "...[I]t is manifest that the proof must be of facts so closely related to the time of the issue of the warrant as to justify a finding of probable cause at that time...The new warrant must rest upon a proper finding and statement by the commissioner that probable cause then exists. That determination, as of that time, cannot be left to mere inference or conjecture."

In the present case, the information provided by Officer Bernhard, which was two days old by the time he swore out his affidavit, did not provide a substantial basis for concluding that drugs would be found in Petitioner's apartment. It is important to note that for Fourth Amendment purposes, the ultimate question for the magistrate was not whether Petitioner was a drug dealer, or whether he generally engaged in illegal activity, but whether there was probable cause to believe that drugs would be found in his apartment on a particular date.

In purporting to apply a "substantial basis" test, the dissent in the Michigan Court of Appeals, which was adopted by the Michigan Supreme Court, relied heavily on the affiant's observation of three black males, wearing expensive clothing and jewelry, shopping for boots in an apparently upscale shoe store. The affiant also observed that two of the men had pagers, and one had a portable telephone. The affiant-officer also claimed to have heard the man with the cellular telephone make a call in which he said, "Give him the other half 'ki'," and "We'll be at the apartment in about 15 minutes." The officer said that he heard something about meeting at a carwash.

Putting the alleged telephone conversation aside, there is nothing about the clothing of the individuals, their jewelry, their taste in expensive footwear, or their use of pagers or cellular phones which would permissibly raise a suspicion of criminal activity. Given the pervasiveness of these accoutrements, they would be suspicious only if one subscribed, consciously or unconsciously, to the prejudice that a black man would possess these things only if he were a drug dealer. Imagine this scenario:

an off-duty officer observes three smartly dressed, middle-aged white women, all wearing expensive jewelry and furs, shopping for $2,500 boots at Nieman-Marcus. One of the women makes a call on a cellular telephone. Petitioner respectfully suggests that the officer would not even think twice about this, much less feel compelled to eavesdrop on the telephone conversation.

An overheard telephone conversation directing someone to give someone else "the other half 'ki'" is, of course a different matter, and Petitioner agrees that the statement, if actually made, is suspicious. In fact, the Court of Appeals majority in this case agreed that the telephone conversation was suspicious. However, assuming that a magistrate might conclude from this statement that the Petitioner sells drugs, there were no further observations which would link Apartment 201 of the Sherbrooke Apartments in Detroit to any drug transaction. In the officer's mind, the only unusual thing about that apartment was the presence of security grates. As the Court of Appeals majority noted, "If grated doors are evidence of criminal activity how do we explain the plethora of steel grates on doors throughout metropolitan Detroit?" [3] There were also contraindications that the apartment was a "stash house": there was no unusual pattern of traffic, and the only thing carried into the apartment was a bag from the shoe store. This indicates a residence, not a stash house.[4] Further, there is nothing, short of the officer's speculation or perhaps wishful thinking, to objectively indicate that any contraband would be in the apartment two days after the observations.

Again, the salient question is not whether the Defendant was a drug dealer, but whether drugs would be found in Apartment 201 of Sherbrooke Apartments on a particular date. Contrary to the suggestion in the Court of Appeals dissent, the suspects' attire and taste in boots does not increase the [3] Returning to the example of the three expensively dressed white women, would the officer find it suspicious if he observed them enter a house in an exclusive suburb which was protected by an expensive security system?

[4] Even drug dealers must live somewhere, and if the officer were truly familiar with drug operations, he would admit that a "stash house" is usually separate from the residence of a dealer.

probability that drugs would be found in the apartment. In this regard, the Court of Appeals majority was correct in stating:

> "Although there may have been reason to believe that defendant and his companions were drug dealers, there was no reason to believe that the apartment in question was the location of a continuing criminal enterprise. There was no observation of a stream of visitors or any other evidence to suggest continuing criminal activity at the apartment. There was nothing to suggest that illegal narcotics were present in the apartment on February 8, 1988, or that, if present, the drugs would remain there until February 10, the day of the search. The officer saw no illegal substance and his conclusion that the apartment was used as a 'stash' house was mere speculation." (Emphasis added).

In addition, the officer's suspicion that the overheard telephone call was the preface to an imminent drug transaction was too stale to support a finding of probable cause two days later. There is, of course, no hard and fast rule as to how fresh information must be to support probable cause. Under Sgro and Gates, that determination will depend on the facts of each case, and there may be situations involving a clear showing of ongoing criminal activity where 2-day old information may be sufficiently corroborated to show probable cause. In the present case, however, apart from the overheard conversation in the shoe store, there is absolutely nothing in the affidavit which would lead a person of reasonable caution to conclude that drugs would be found in apartment 201 two days later. Furthermore, there was nothing to show ongoing criminal activity in apartment 201 of Sherbrooke Apartments.

As the Court of Appeals majority noted, Officer Bernhard's affidavit is noteworthy for the information it does not contain. No sales, controlled or otherwise, were observed in the apartment. There was no pattern of heavy traffic, nor any other evidence of continuing criminal activity in the apartment. In fact, there was apparently no surveillance or investigation whatsoever in the two days between Bernhard's observations and the issuance of the search warrant. In short, there is nothing to show a pattern of criminal activity in apartment 201, other than the officer's speculation. Under Sgro, "inference and conjecture" does not equal probable cause.

The divided nature of the state appellate court opinions in this case (the Court of Appeals rejecting the probable cause determination in a 2-1 vote, and the Michigan Supreme Court reversing the Court of Appeals in a 4-2 vote) suggests that the concept of "substantial basis" articulated in Illinois v. Gates and the idea of staleness discussed in Sgro v. United States should be be revisited and clarified by this Court. The majority decision of the Michigan Supreme Court in this case conflicts with Gates and Sgro, and Petitioner respectfully asks that this Court review the conflict, and reverse the judgment of the Michigan Supreme Court.

CONCLUSION

WHEREFORE, Petitioner WILLIAM ADAMS asks that this Honorable Court grant a writ of certiorari and reverse the judgment of the Michigan Supreme Court.

On order of the Court, the application for leave to appeal is considered and, pursuant to MCR 7.302(F)(1), in lieu of granting leave to appeal, we REVERSE the judgment of the Court of Appeals and REINSTATE the judgment of the Recorder's Court for the City of Detroit for the reasons stated in the dissenting opinion in the Court of Appeals.

Cavanaugh, C.J., and Levin, J., would deny or grant leave to appeal and dissent from the peremptory reversal of the Court of Appeals.

I, CORBIN R. DAVIS, Clerk of the Michigan Supreme court, certify that the foregoing is a true and complete copy of the order entered at the direction of Court.

STATE OF MICHIGAN

COURT OF APPEALS

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

Plaintiff-Appellee,

April 7, 1993

v

No. 127760

WILLIAM ADAMS,

Defendant-Appellant.

Before: Holbrook, Jr., PJ, and Sullivan and Taylor, JJ.

PER CURIAM

Defendant was convicted by a jury of possession with intent to deliver 650 or more grams of cocaine MCL 333.7401(2)(a)(i); MSA 14.15 (7401)(2)(a)(i), and sentenced to the mandatory term of life imprisonment without parole. He appeals as of right. We reverse.

We agree with defendant that the information on which the search warrant was based was stale. The magistrate should not have issued the warrant and the trial court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence and quash the warrant.

We review a magistrate's decision to issue a warrant to determine whether a reasonably cautious person could have concluded that there was a substantial basis for the finding of probable cause to issue the warrant. People v Russo, 439 Mich 584, 603; 487 NW2d 698 (1992). Probable cause to search is concerned with whether certain identifiable objects are probably to be found at the present time in a certain identifiable place. Id, p 605. A delay between obtaining the information and issuing the warrant is not necessarily fatal, but is a factor in the determination of probable cause to search. Id.

In this case, the warrant was issued two days after a police officer observed defendant engaged in suspicious behavior. The officer's attention was drawn to the three individuals because of their lavish clothing and gold chains. The overheard conversation reasonably convinced him that these individuals were involved in narcotics transactions. However, it is a major leap to conclude that because these individuals then went to an apartment with a security steel grating over the door, that the apartment was a "stash" house.

Although there may have been reason to believe that defendant and his companions were drug dealers, there was no reason to believe that the apartment in question was the location of a continuing criminal enterprise. There was no observation of a stream of visitors or any other evidence to suggest continuing criminal activity at the apartment. There was nothing to suggest that illegal narcotics were present in the apartment on February 8, 1988, or that, if present, the drugs would remain there until February 10, the day of the search. The officer saw no illegal substance and his conclusion that the apartment was used as a "stash" house was mere speculation.

The trial court relied heavily on the fact that there were steel grates on the door of the apartment. If grated doors are evidence of criminal activity how do we explain the plethora of steel grates on doors throughout metropolitan Detroit?

Drugs were found in apartment 201. Whose stash was it? There is no direct evidence establishing that this defendant was the possessor of the narcotics. This is the stubborn fact.

Ongoing criminal activity is not established by the presence of security grates nor is it established by the appearance of defendant and his companions. While security devices are common throughout the area, defendant's appearance and use of the phone, his overheard conversation, and beepers suggest that defendant is a drug dealer. This inference, however, does not in turn lead to a reasonable inference that defendant engaged in criminal activity or stored drugs at Apartment 201 on the date the warrant was issued.

Reversed.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

Plaintiff-Appellee,

v

No. 127760

WILLIAM ADAMS,

Defendant-Appellant.

Before: Holbrook, PJ, and Sullivan and Taylor, JJ.

TAYLOR, J. (Dissenting)

I disagree with the majority's conclusions that the warrant was issued improperly because the information upon which it was based was stale, and that there was insufficient evidence adduced at trial showing that defendant possessed that cocaine to support the conviction.

I would hold that the magistrate properly issued the search warrant despite the fact that the information upon which the warrant was issued was two days old. A search warrant and the underlying affidavit are to be read in a common-sense and realistic manner. We afford deference to the magistrate's decision, and must determine whether a reasonable magistrate could have found a substantial basis to infer the evidence of ongoing narcotics trafficking would be found in an apartment two days after defendant and others were seen entering it. People v Russo, 439 Mich 584, 604-605; 487 NW2d 925 (1992).

The affidavit supporting the warrant indicates that the affiant, a narcotics officer with the Detroit Police Department, went to a store to buy boots on February 8, 1988, while off-duty. There he saw three men enter the store who were dressed in fur coats, gold chains and gold Rolex-type watches, and who were considering buying boots costing $250 to $300. Two of the men had pagers and one had a portable cellular telephone. The pagers went off and several calls were made. The officer heard part of one call made in the boot store by the man with the cellular telephone later identified as defendant. During this call, defendant said, "Give him the other half 'ki'...Do you have his number? If you don't I'll put it on your beeper...We'll be at the apartment in about 15 minutes." Defendant went on to say something about meeting "at the carwash."

The officer's experience led him to suspect that a drug deal was in progress in light of the overheard telephone conversation and the dress, equipment and actions of the men. Therefore, he positioned himself to watch the three men leave the store and get into a white 1987 Acura automobile. He followed them to an apartment where he saw the men get out of the car, remove what he thought were packages from the boot store from the trunk, and go into the front of apartment 210. This apartment has elaborate grates, unlike all the surrounding apartments that for the most part had no grates at all. When the officer returned to the position from which he could see the Acura where it had been parked at the back of the building, the Acura was gone.

Also included in the affidavit was the officer's conclusion that the three men had rushed from the store to retrieve drugs from the apartment, which he believed was being used as a safe or "stash" house, then delivered the drugs elsewhere, i.e., at a carwash. This latter conclusion was based on the affiant's "personal knowledge that carwashes are often used as narcotic transfer points because their interiors are difficult for police to observe and a high traffic volume is common."

The fact that forty-eight hours elapsed between the time the officer observed the men and the issuance of the warrant is not dispositive.

> Time as a factor in the determination of probable cause to search is weighed and balanced in light of other variables in the equation, such as whether the crime is a single instance or an ongoing pattern of protracted violations, whether the inherent nature of a scheme suggests that it is probably continuing, and the nature of the property sought, that is, whether it is likely to be promptly disposed of or retained by the person committing the offense. The matter must be determined by the circumstances of each case. [People v Russo, supra. 439 Mich at 605-606.]

The presence of the security grate at the apartment, the lavish clothing and the beepers and cellular telephone, as well as the relatively large quantity of contraband being discussed, all lead me to conclude that there was ongoing criminal activity at the apartment.

The fact that the apartment was equipped with an elaborate security grating in an area in which no other apartments were equipped with any grating at all suggests that the apartment was being used for ongoing criminal activity because such precautions would not be necessary if the apartment was used on a onetime basis for a drug transaction. The three men observed using the apartment all wore flashy and expensive clothing, and were living a lavish life-style. They were in possession of electronic equipment showing a steady pattern of business activity involving an illegal occupation.

Every indication of continuity is present here, and no indication that the narcotics activity was transitory. It is readily apparent that these three men were involved in dealing large amounts of narcotics on an ongoing basis, and that the apartment was there warehouse.

In summary, I would hold that the affidavit in support of the search warrant contains evidence establishing a sufficiently substantial basis of probable cause to conclude that the evidence sought might be found at the apartment. The conversation the officer overheard being made on the cellular telephone in which defendant told someone to give "him" the other "half 'ki'", viewed in conjunction with the equipment, dress, and actions of all three men, leads me to conclude that the search warrant was properly issued.

I also disagree with the majority holding that there was insufficient evidence adduced at trial to establish defendant's constructive possession of the cocaine found in the apartment.

As the police were executing the search warrant, they saw defendant and another man approaching the apartment. Defendant inserted a key in the door, then opened and entered, but fled when the officers announced there presence. These facts, along with the earlier observations of defendant and his cohorts and the overheard conversation on the cellular telephone, are sufficient to demonstrate defendant's knowledge, proximity and accessibility of the drug. People v Petrella, 424 Mich 221, 268-270; 380 NW2d 11 (1985); People v Hill, 433 Mich 464, 469-470; 446 NW2d 140 (1989); People v Sammons 191 Mich App 351, 371; 478 NW2d 901 (1991), lv den 439 Mich 933 (1992).

Defendant's last claim concerns the mandatory life sentence without possiblity of parole imposed in this case which he contends is disproportionately harsh, cruel, and unusual. Our Supreme Court recently held that the mandatory life in prison term for convictions of possession of 650 or more grams of cocaine, MCL 333.7403(2)(a)(i); MSA 14.15(7403)(2)(a)(i), was cruel and unusual punishment under the Michigan Constitution[1] in People v Bullock, 440 Mich 15; 485 NW2d 866 (1992). Recently, a panel of this Court extended the Bullock analysis to partially invalidate sentences of life without parole imposed for convictions of delivery of 650 or more grams of cocaine. People v Fluker, ___ Mich App ___; ___ NW2d ___ (Nos. 131295, 131513, 131517, rel'd 12/7/92), lv pdg. If Fluker is followed defendant will be eligible for parole after completing ten calendar years of his sentence.

However, an earlier panel of this court held that the mandatory life sentence without possibility of parole passed constitutional muster in cases of delivery of 650 or more grams of a controlled substance. People v Alexander, 188 Mich App 96, 106; 469 NW2d 10 (1991). Under AO-1990-6, Alexander is binding precedent on this issue. This is so despite Bullock because our Supreme Court appears to limit its holding to cases of possession, id., 37-38, and because the Bullock court's analysis centered on People v Lorentzen, 387 Mich 167; 194 NW2d 827 (1972). I would conclude that Alexander, which is based in large measure on the progeny of Lorentzen, survives Bullock on the issue presented.

Accordingly, I would affirm on all issues.

COUNTER-STATEMENT OF FACTS

Defendant-Appellee WILLIAM ADAMS was convicted by a jury in the Recorder's Court for the City of Detroit, the Honorable Terrance K. Boyle, presiding, of possession with intent to deliver more than 650 grams of a mixture containing cocaine, MCL 333.7401(1) and MCL 333.7401(2)(a)(i); MSA 14.15 (7401)(1) and MSA 14.15 (7401)(2)(a)(i). He was sentenced to mandatory life imprisonment without parole.

The cocaine which formed the basis of Defendant's conviction was seized pursuant to a search warrant which was issued on February 10, 1988. Prior to trial, Defendant moved to suppress all evidence seized pursuant to the warrant, based on the insufficient and defective nature of the affidavit in support of the warrant. The affiant for the warrant was August Bernhard, a Detroit police officer. A copy of the search warrant affidavit is appended to this Brief.

In his affidavit, Officer Bernhard alleged that on the afternoon of February 8, 1988 (two days before the search warrant was issued), while off-duty, he was shopping for boots at a store in the Eight Mile-Farmington Road area. He said that he saw three "black males" enter the store, and noted that they wore full coats, some gold jewelry, and "Rolex type" watches. Bernhard also stated that, like himself, the subjects were there to purchase boots, and were "looking at ones running some $250-300." Bernhard stated that two of the three subjects had pagers, and the third had a cellular telephone. Bernhard claimed to have overheard one call, in which one subject told someone to "give him the other half 'ki'." The caller went on to say, "we'll be at the apartment in about 15 minutes," and also said something about meeting at a carwash.

According to Bernhard's affidavit, he left the store and set up what he called "surveillance." He observed the three subjects leave the store and enter an automobile. However, the affidavit does not state how much time elapsed between when Bernhard overheard the telephone conversation and when the subjects left the store. Bernhard followed the subjects to the Sherbrooke Apartments in Detroit. He observed the subjects remove something from the trunk, which he stated were "probably packages from the boot store." He stated that after changing his location, he observed the subjects enter apartment 201. Bernhard stated that each apartment in the complex had a separate, outside entrance, and that apartment 201 had some sort of grate. He said that "only a few" of the apartments had grates.

Bernhard said that when he returned to where he had seen the subjects park the car, it was gone. He did not observe which of the three subjects, if any, drove the car away, and he could not say who, if anyone, remained in apartment 201.

Based on these facts, Bernhard concluded that apartment 201 was a "stash house," and that narcotics and related items would be found there two days after his observations.

Although the trial judge denied the motion to suppress, he repeatedly called the issue of probable cause a "close question" (Tr. 3-3-89, 9, 14, 21). Referring in particular to Defendant's argument that probable cause, if it existed at all, was stale, because the warrant was issued two days after Officer Bernhard's observations, the trial judge stated, "Now, I've already said it's a close question. If I were sitting down and I were the one signing the warrant, and I say this for the record, I might have some serious questions about whether I would draw the inference there." (Tr. 3-3-89, 21).

The Court of Appeals reversed Defendant's conviction, holding:

> "We agree with defendant that the information on which the search warrant was based was stale. The magistrate should not have issued the warrant and the trial court erred in refusing to suppress the evidence and quash the warrant." Slip Opinion, p. 1.

The prosecutor filed an untimely, or delayed application for leave to appeal, stating that the delay was due to "time needed to review the opinion of the Court of Appeals," as well as the press of other cases.

I. THE COURT OF APPEALS CORRECTLY REVERSED DEFENDANT-APPELLEE'S CONVICTION, WHERE THE AFFIDAVIT IN SUPPORT OF THE SEARCH WARRANT, SIGNED TWO DAYS AFTER THE AFFIANT MADE CERTAIN OBSERVATIONS, WAS INSUFFICIENT TO SHOW A SUBSTANTIAL BASIS FOR FINDING PROBABLE CAUSE.

As the Court of Appeals noted in this case, Officer Bernhard made certain observations, including an overheard conversation on a cellular telephone, which raised a suspicion that the three people he saw in the shoe store were going to consummate a drug transaction that day. However, the search warrant for apartment 201 of the Sherbrooke Apartments was not issued that day, but two days later. Thus, the critical question is not what the Defendant may have done on February 8, 1988, but whether the affidavit contained sufficient information for a magistrate to conclude that there would be drugs in apartment 201 two days later, on February 10, 1988. Although the trial judge rejected this "staleness" argument, he repeatedly called it a "close question." (Tr. 3-3-89, 9, 14, 21). The Court of Appeals, applying the standard of review set forth in People v Russo, 439 Mich 584 (1992), correctly found that under the facts of this case, the information in the affidavit was stale, and there was otherwise no substantial basis for the magistrate to conclude that there was probable cause to issue a search warrant.

In Russo, this Court resolved a split in the Court of Appeals as to the standard for appellate review of the issuance of search warrants, holding that "appellate scrutiny of a magistrate's decision involves neither de novo review nor application of an abuse of discretion standard." Id., 439 Mich at 603. Instead, the reviewing court must determine "whether a reasonably cautious person could have concluded that there was a 'substantial basis' for the finding of probable cause," based on the search warrant affidavit. Id.

In People v Russo, this Court reaffirmed the principle that the staleness of information in the affidavit is a factor in the determination of probable cause. Under both the Michigan and federal constitutions, a search warrant must be supported by probable cause existing at the time the warrant is issued. Id., 439 Mich at 606-607; People v David, 119 Mich App 289 (1982), lv den 417 Mich 858 ("The passage of time is a valid consideration in deciding whether probable cause exists"). Probable cause or information which is stale--that is, which existed remote in time from the issuance of the warrant--may render a warrant invalid.

The United States Supreme Court first addressed this issue in Sgro v United States, 287 US 206, 77 L Ed 260, 53 S Ct 138 (1932). In Sgro, a warrant was issued to search a hotel for illegal intoxicants, based on information which was 21 days old. Holding that the search was unlawful, the Court stated, "...[I]t is manifest that the proof must be of facts so closely related to the time of the issue of the warrant as to justify a finding of probable cause at that time...The new warrant must rest upon a proper finding and statement by the commissioner that probable cause then exists. That determination, as of that time, cannot be left to mere inference or conjecture."

A review of Michigan cases shows that under the facts of the present case, the Court of Appeals was clearly correct in finding that nothing Officer Bernhard observed on February 8, 1988 would show probable cause that drugs would be found in apartment 201 two days later.

In People v Siemieniec, 368 Mich 405 (1962), the Michigan Supreme Court held that a warrant was improperly issued on September 17 upon an affidavit of a police officer stating that on September 13 he had observed the defendant making illegal sales of liquor on the premises to be searched. The Court stated that there "was nothing in the affidavit presented in this case to indicate that the acts observed on September 13 continued to occur on September 17." Id.

In the present case, there was at best a single negotiation for 1/2 kilogram of a some substance (the overheard conversation provided no information as to what substance-cocaine, marijuana or something else-the caller was talking about). There is even less probable cause here than in Siemieniac, where the police actually observed multiple sales out of the premises.

In People v Wright, 367 Mich 611 (1962), an officer observed illegal gambling equipment and liquor at a certain establishment six days prior to obtaining a search warrant. Holding that the officer's observations were too stale to support a finding of probable cause, the Supreme Court stated:

> "Powell's affidavit related facts six days stale. The factual situation presented by that affidavit, without more, was too remote to justify the issuance of a search warrant. We are left to surmise > what information, if any, the police obtained from their intervening investigation and surveillance of defendant's premises. Failure to state what was observed during the investigation and surveillance described in the police officer's affidavit, permits an inference that nothing was observed to indicate that the offenses allegedly committed on February 18 continued to be committed at the time request was made on February 24 for the search warrant." 116 NW 2d at 788.

Again, the information in the present affidavit is even more insufficient than in Wright. In fact, there was no intervening surveillance or investigation between February 8th and February 10th which would corroborate Officer Bernhard's speculation that drugs would be found in apartment 201.

In People v David, supra, a confidential informant made a controlled buy of marijuana in the Defendant's trailer. A search warrant was issued three days later. Finding that the magistrate's decision to issue the warrant was error, the Court stated:

> "[I]n the case at bar, the affidavit alleged only a single sale, not > continuing drug sales. The affidavit did not even state that defendant possessed any marijuana after he made the sale to the informant. On the facts presented to the magistrate, there is absolutely no evidence to suggest that defendant would still possess marijuana three days after the sale to the informant." 119 Mich App at 297 (Emphasis added).

There is, of course, no hard and fast rule as to how fresh information must be to support probable cause. Under Russo, that determination will depend on the facts of each case, and there may be situations involving a clear showing of ongoing criminal activity where 2-day old information may be sufficiently corroborated to show probable cause. In the present case, however, apart from the overheard conversation in the shoe store, there is absolutely nothing in the affidavit which would lead a person of reasonable caution to conclude that drugs would be found in apartment 201 two days later. Furthermore, there was nothing to show ongoing criminal activity in apartment 201 of Sherbrooke Apartments.

The fact that three "black males" were in a store, wearing what the officer believed to be expensive clothes and jewelry, and looking at $250 boots, is completely consistent with innocent activity.[1]

It is racist and offensive to imply that an African American who has the means and the desire to dress well is more likely to be a drug dealer than a similarly inclined Caucasian. Would the officer have been equally suspicious of three expensively dressed white people shopping for $250 shoes in Birmingham?

Also, the fact that apartment 201 had metal grates means nothing in a city where many people have such grates for reasons

[1] In some cases, facts which are consistent with innocent conduct can create a suspicion which might justify an investigatory stop of the type described in Terry v Ohio, 392 US 1, 20 L Ed 2d 889, 88 S Ct 1868 (1968), but such innocent information cannot be aggregated to satisfy the more demanding requirements of probable cause. For example, in a number of so-called drug courier profile cases, the United States Supreme Court has upheld investigative Terry-stops of suspects, but has consistently rejected the proposition that the profile factors amount to probable cause. See, e.g., Florida v Royer, 460 US 491, 75 L Ed 2d 229, 103 S Ct 1319 (1983); Reid v Georgia, 448 US 438, 65 L Ed 2d 890, 100 S Ct 2752 (1980)(aggregation of innocent factors under the profile did not even amount to reasonable suspicion under Terry).

of personal security. Even Officer Bernhard admitted in his affidavit that some other apartments also had grates.

Bernhard's affidavit is also noteworthy for the information it does not contain. No sales, controlled or otherwise, were observed in the apartment. There was no pattern of heavy traffic, nor any other evidence of continuing criminal activity in the apartment. In fact, there was apparently no surveillance or investigation whatsoever in the two days between Bernhard's observations and the issuance of the search warrant. In short, there is nothing to show a pattern of criminal activity in apartment 201, other than the officer's speculation. The Court of Appeals in this case stated:

> "Although there may have been reason to believe that defendant and his companions were drug dealers, there was no reason to believe that the apartment in question was the location of a continuing criminal enterprise. There was no observation of a stream of visitors or any other evidence to suggest continuing criminal activity at the apartment. There was nothing to suggest that illegal narcotics were present in the apartment on February 8, 1988, or > that, if present, the drugs would remain there until February 10, the day of the search. The officer saw no illegal substance and his conclusion that the apartment was used as a 'stash' house was mere speculation." Slip Opinion, p. 1 (Emphasis added).

The Court of Appeals properly applied the Russo test in reviewing the search warrant affidavit in this case, and correctly concluded that on these facts, there was no substantial basis for finding probable cause. The issue is not jurisprudentially significant, and the Court of Appeals opinion is not clearly erroneous. Therefore, Defendant-Appellee respectfully asks this Court to deny leave to appeal.

II. UNDER PRINCIPLES OF DOUBLE JEOPARDY, THE PROSECUTOR MAY NOT APPEAL A JUDGMENT VACATING A CONVICTION FOR INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE.

The prosecutor argues that the Court of Appeals majority erred in finding insufficient evidence to support Defendant's conviction. Clearly, the bulk of the Court of Appeals opinion relies on the insufficiency of the search warrant affidavit to support probable cause, and its correct decision reversing the conviction on that ground is sufficient reason to deny leave to appeal without reference to the sufficiency of the evidence issue.

However, assuming that the Court of Appeals decision is based also on the insufficiency of the evidence at trial under Jackson v Virginia, 443 US 307, 61 LEd2d 560, 99 SCt 2781 (1979) and People v Hampton, 407 Mich 354 (1979), cert den 449 US 885 (1980), the prosecutor is precluded from taking an appeal by leave on that issue. A prosecutor may appeal only under the express provisions of MCL 770.12; MSA 28.1109. People v Cooke, 419 Mich 420 (1984). Section 770.12(2) states that the prosecutor may take an appeal by leave in a criminal case only in "the protection against double jeopardy under section 15 of article I of the state constitution of 1963 and amendment V of the constitution of the United States would not bar further proceedings against the defendant." Applications for leave to appeal to the Michigan Supreme Court are included in this proscription, under sec. 2(c) of the statute. In People v Wolfe, 156 Mich App 225 (1986), the Court held that the statute bars prosecutorial appeals of orders or judgments granting relief based on the sufficiency of the evidence.

For these reasons, this Court is without jurisdiction to hear the prosecutor's appeal of this issue.

In addition, to the extent that the Court of Appeals found the evidence at trial to be legally insufficient, that decision was correct, as nothing beyond Defendant's mere presence was shown. People v Burrell, 253 Mich 321 (1931).

SUMMARY AND RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Defendant-Appellee WILLIAM ADAMS asks this Honorable Court to deny leave to appeal.

SEARCH WARRANT AND AFFIDAVIT

To the Sheriff or any peace officer of said county:

August Bernhart

Affiant, having subscribed and sworn to an affidavit for a Search Warrant, and I, having examined affiant under oath, am satisfied that probable cause exists:

THEREFORE, IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN, I command that you search the following described place:

The entire premises of apartment 201 of the Sherbrooke Garden Apartments located on the Southfield Expressway Service Drive, south of Eight Mile road in the City of Detroit. The apartment is the southern most apartment on the second floor and is in the name of J. Quinn (mailbox).

and to seize, secure, tabulate,, and make return according to law the following property and things: all suspected controlled substances; all monies (or other assets), books, and records used in connection with illegal narcotics trafficking or the hiding of proceeds from illegal narcotics trafficking; all equipment and supplies used in the manufacture, delivery or sale of controlled substances; all firearms incendiary or explosive devices used in connection with the above described activities; all evidence of ownership, occupancy, possession or control of the premises.

The following facts are sworn to by affiant in support of the issuance of the Warrant:

Affiant is a police officer assigned to the Narcotic Section of the Detroit Police Department for the past 6 years.

On 8 February 1988, about 3PM, affiant was off duty and went to Scott Colburn's Saddlery at Farmington Road and Eight Mile to buy boots. While in the store, affiant saw 3 black males enter the store, all dressed in fur coats, wearing gold chains, and gold Rolex type watches. Two had pagers, and one had a portable cellular telephone. The three were there to purchase boots, and were looking at ones running some $250-$300. While there the pagers went off and several calls were made by two of the three. Affiant's experience indicated that the dress, equipment, and actions of the three were characteristic of those in the drug trade. The phone calls on the cellular phone were made in the store and affiant was able to overhear a part of one call. In that call, the caller told someone to "give him the other half 'ki'". The caller went on to ask "do your have his number - if you don't I'll put in on you beeper." The caller then said, "we'll be at the apartment in about 15 minutes," and went on to say something about meeting "at the carwash."

Affiant, suspecting a dope deal was in progress, left the store and took up a position from which he could see the three leave the store and enter a white 1987 Acura. Affiant followed the Acura, which was going between 50 and 60 mph on Eight Mile, to the above described Sherbrooke Apartments. Affiant was able to get in position to see the three exit the Acura, remove something (probably packages from the boot store) from its trunk. The building is constructed motel-fashion so that the individual apartment entrances are on the outside, facing the service drive. Affiant, by changing his location, watched the three go to the described apartment, which he later determined to be #201. The apartment had elaborate grates, unlike the other apartments, only a few of which had grates of any kind. By the time affiant returned to the position from which he had seen the Acura park in the rear of the building, the car was gone. The Acura could have been at the Sherbrooke Apartments for no more than a few minutes.

In light of the affiant's experience and the above described observations, affiant concludes that he three men rushed from the store to retrieve the dope from the apartment to deliver it elsewhere, presumably at a carwash. Affiant knows from personal knowledge that carwashes are often used as narcotic transfer points because their interiors are difficult for police to observe and a high traffic volume is common. Affiant concludes that apartment #201 is used as a safe or "stash" house. Affiant's knowledge of the narcotics trade indicates that weapons and/or explosive or incendiary devices are commonly used in connection therewith; that monies or other assets derived from the trade are often found at the sites of narcotics related search warrant execution; and that records relating to narcotics transactions or the hiding of proceeds from such transactions are commonly kept in the course of illegal drug trafficking, and, likewise, are frequently found at the sites of search warrant executions.
